"The way these governments are handling the virus is foolish, highly unrealistic, and insensitive to women," says Carmen Barroso, the regional director of the International Planned Parenthood Federation in the Western Hemisphere. "Even if a woman is convinced by the governments' messages, she might still get pregnant unintentionally. What the government should be doing, besides combating the virus, of course, is they should make it easier for women to avoid pregnancies they don't want."

Here's the Problem With Telling Women in El Salvador Not to Get Pregnant

Takepart

JAN 28, 2016

Jennifer Swann is TakePart's culture and lifestyle reporter.

Giselle Carino, deputy director for the International Planned Parenthood Federation's western hemisphere region, called El Salvador's response to the Zika virus "insufficient at best," but she hopes it will trigger legislators in that country to reconsider their ban on abortion, which was criminalized in 1998. A United Nations agreement drafted in 2013 urged governments in Latin America to legalize abortion as a means of improving quality of life.

„Wir fordern die Regierungen auf, den Zugang zu Verhütungsmitteln zu erleichtern, insbesondere für Gruppen mit geringem Einkommen“, so Giselle Carino von IPPF gegenüber der britischen Tageszeitung „The Guardian“. Außerdem müsse die Möglichkeit geboten werden, sicher abzutreiben. Weiters müsse eine Bewusstseinsbildungskampagne gestartet werden, damit die Frauen über das Risiko einer Infektion und ihre Optionen aufgeklärt werden. Laut IPPF ist die Hälfte der Schwangerschaften in Ländern wie Kolumbien, El Salvador und Ecuador ungeplant - und oft Folge sexueller Gewalt.
